Fish is Fish

Leo Lionni

"Frogs are frogs and fish is fish and that's that!" says the tadpole in this story. What do you know about frogs and fish?

Did you know that frogs . . .

- ... live on every continent except Antarctica?
- ... are amphibians, meaning that they live part of their life in water and part on land?
- ... have gills when they're tadpoles and grow lungs when they turn into frogs?
- ... can lay several thousand eggs at a time?
- ... are cold-blooded (unlike humans), and their body temperature stays the same as that of the water or air around them?
- ... first appeared on earth about 180 million years ago?

Did you know that minnows . . .

- ... make up the largest family of freshwater fishes?
- ... are usually less than six inches long, but some species can grow up to nine feet?
- ... have no eyelids, so they cannot close their eyes while sleeping?
- ... are able to breathe underwater by taking oxygen out of the water with their gills?
- ... are descended from fish that first appeared about 240 million years ago?

If you want to know more interesting facts about frogs and fish, ask a librarian or bookseller for other books about these fascinating creatures.

The background of the book cover is a textured, light blue wash. On the left and right sides, there are vertical strokes of green paint, creating the appearance of tall, slender reeds or grasses. The paint has a visible, slightly grainy texture, suggesting a watercolor or pastel technique.

Fish is Fish

At the edge of the woods there was a pond, and there a minnow and a tadpole swam among the weeds. They were inseparable friends.

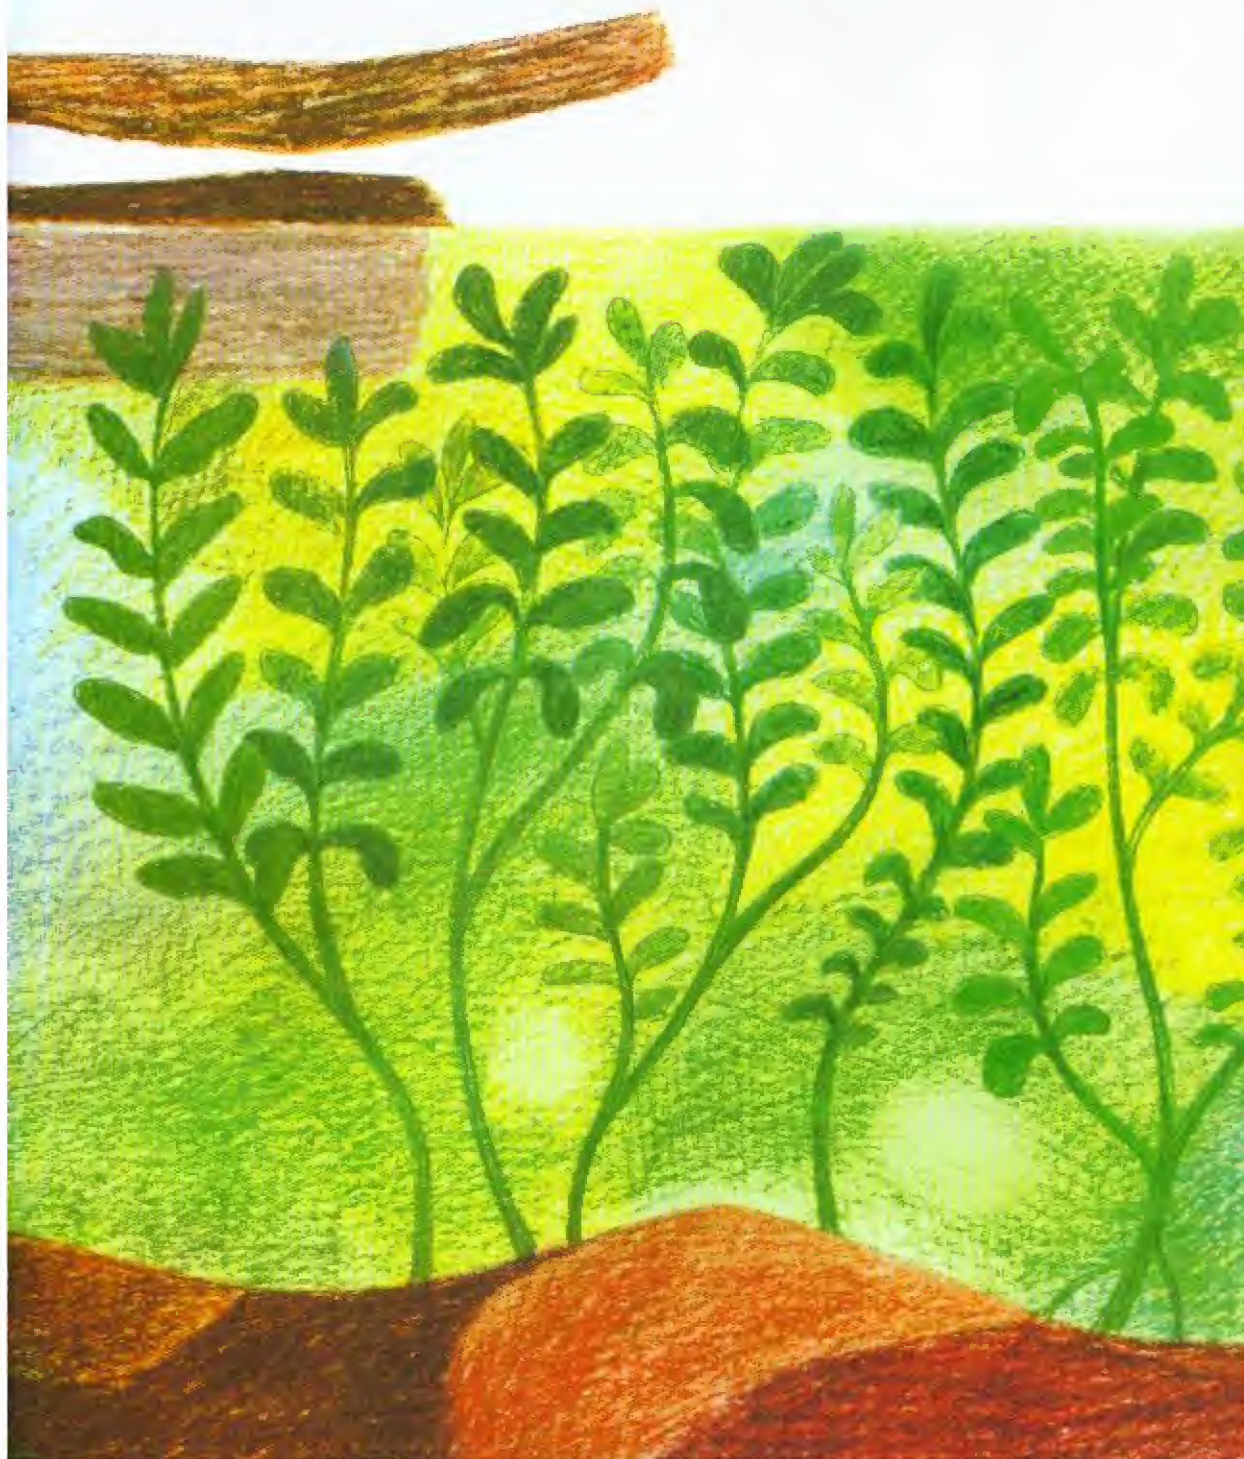

One morning the tadpole discovered that during the night he had grown two little legs.

"Look" he said triumphantly. "Look, I am a frog!"

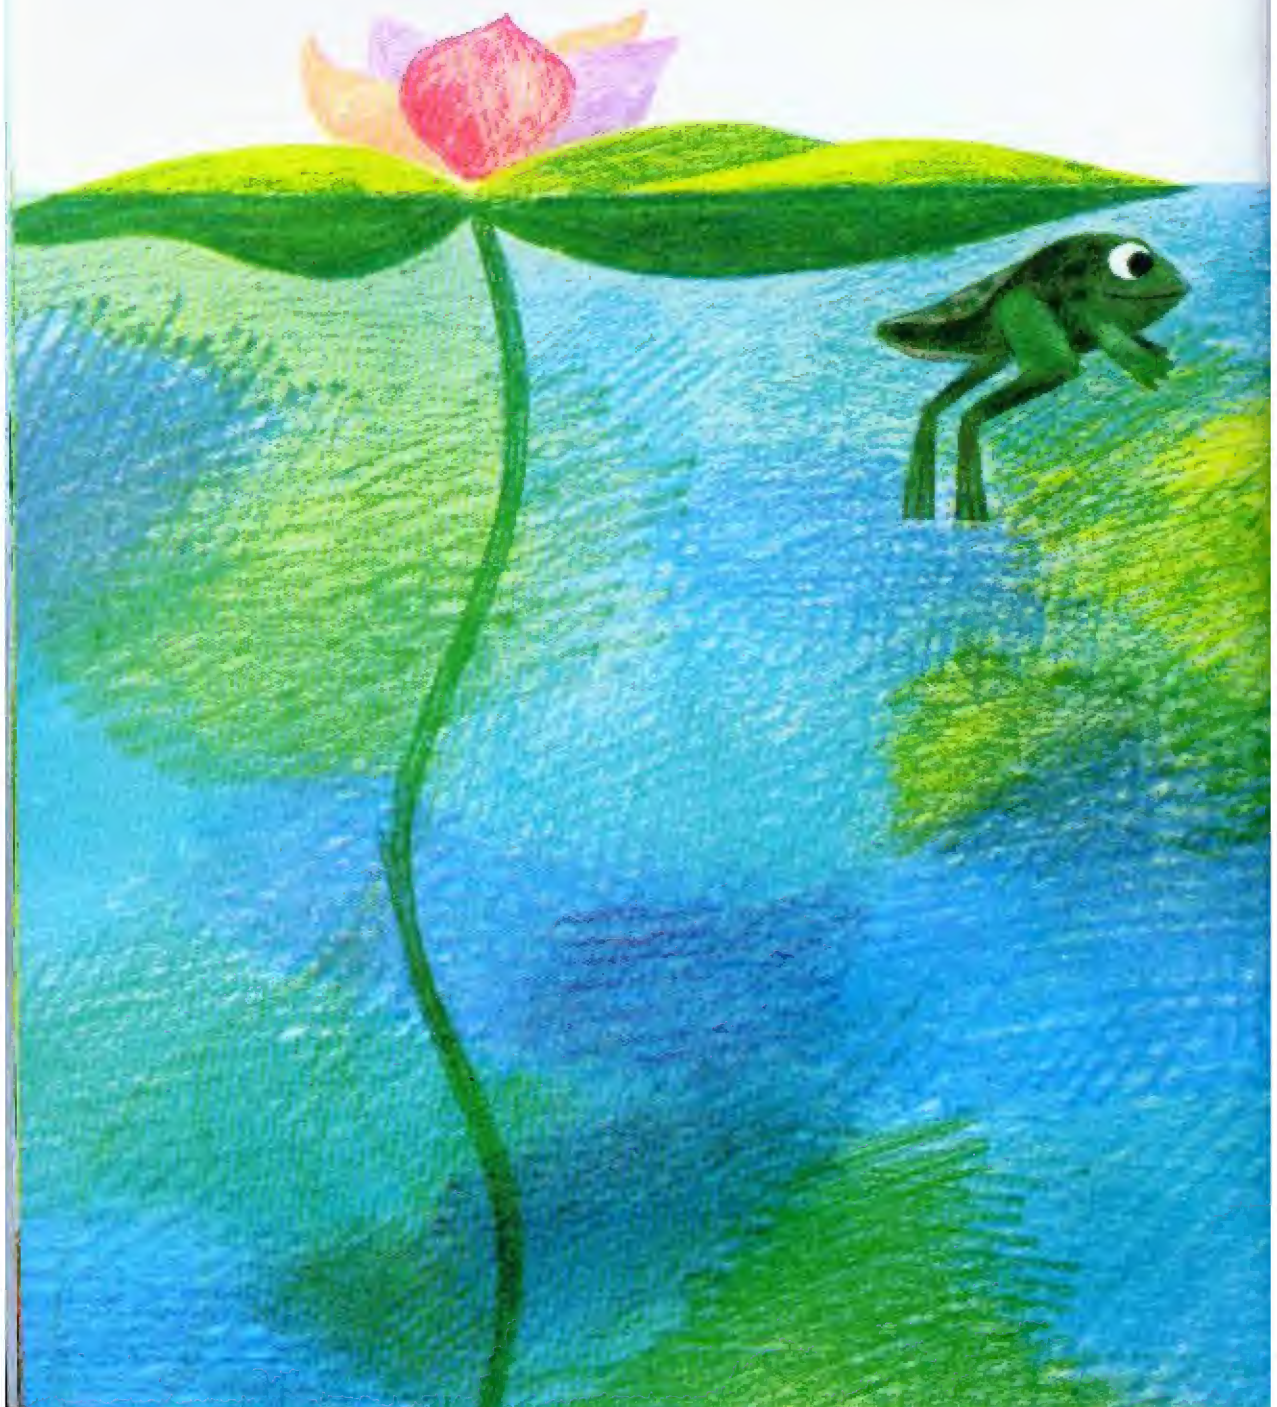

"Nonsense," said the minnow. "How could you be a frog if only last night you were a little fish, just like me!"

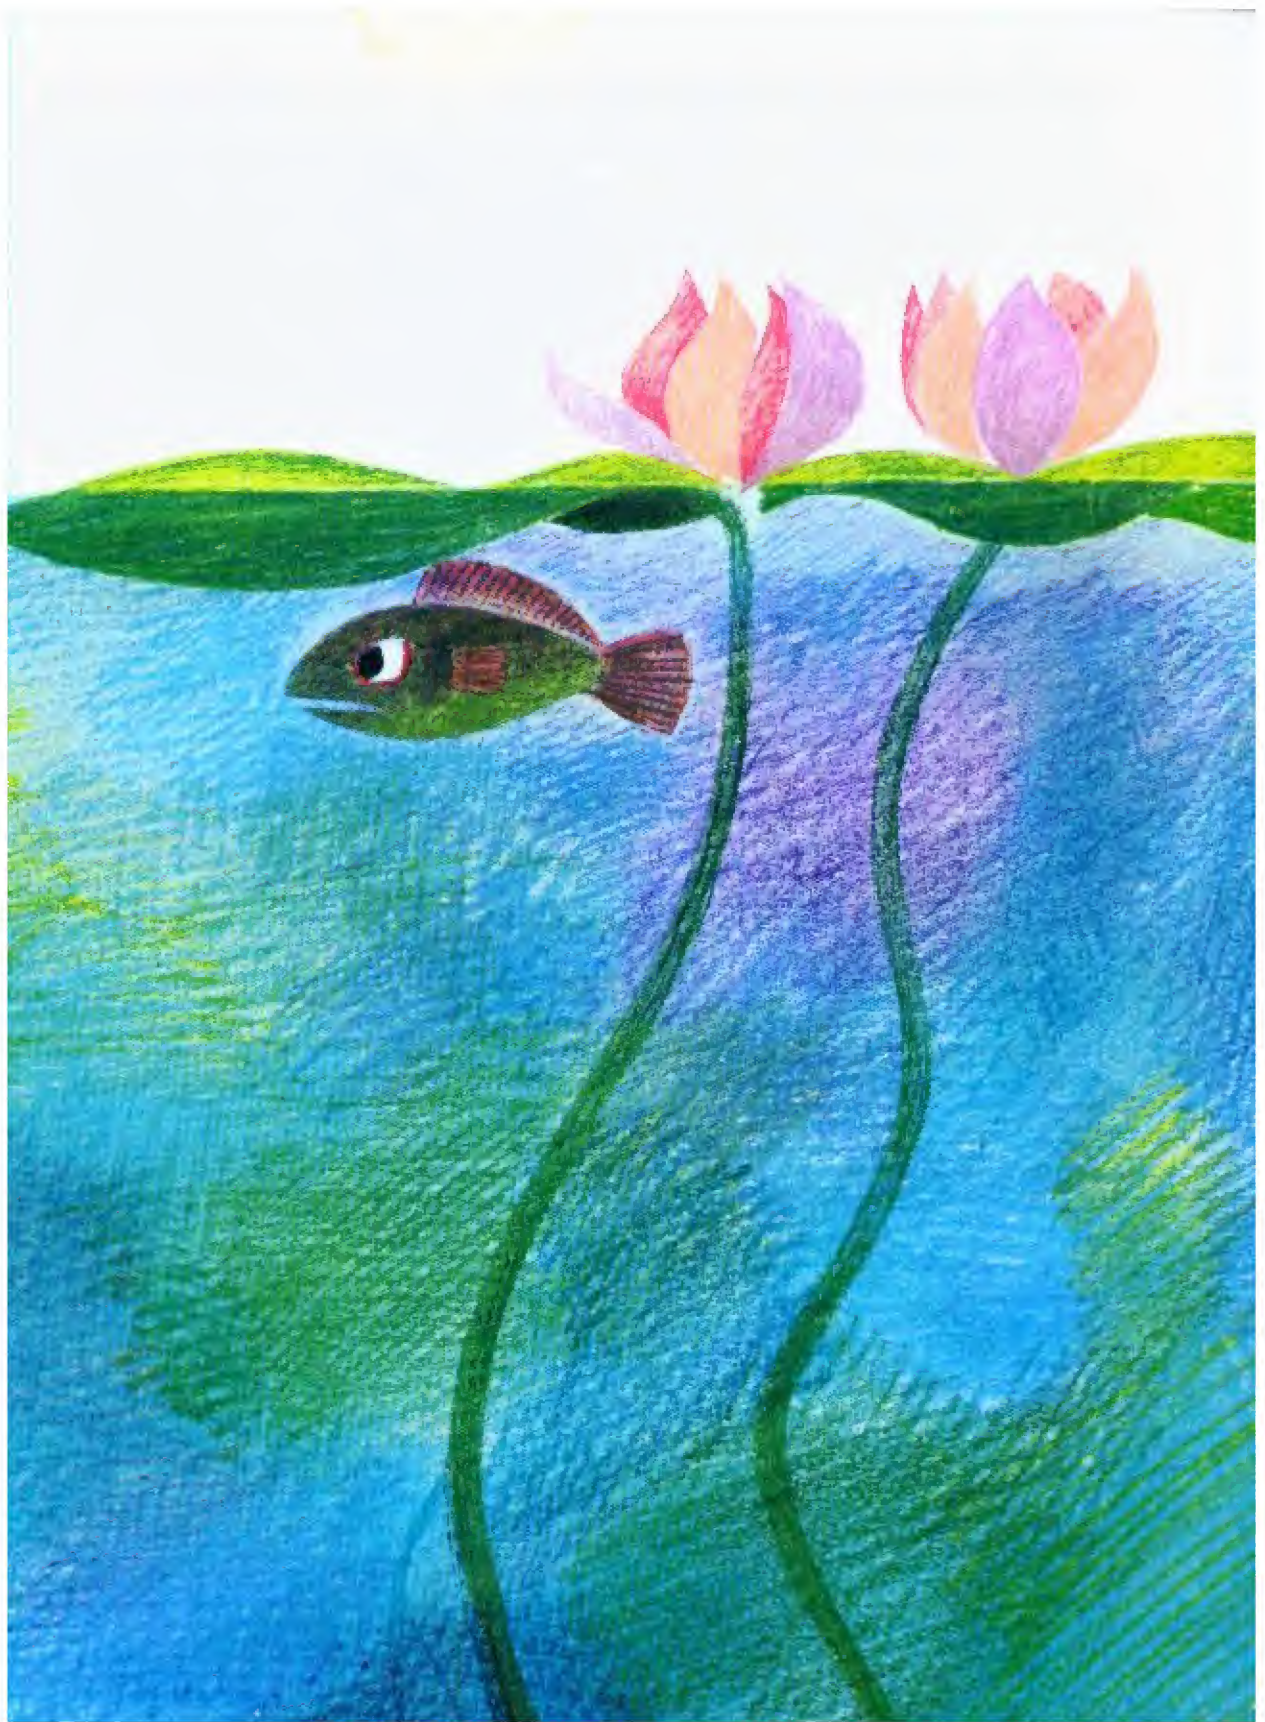

They argued and argued until finally the tadpole said, "Frogs are frogs and fish is fish and that's that!"

In the weeks that followed, the tadpole grew tiny front legs and his tail got smaller and smaller.

And then one fine day, a real frog now, he climbed out of the water and onto the grassy bank.

The minnow too had grown and had become a full-fledged fish. He often wondered where his four-footed friend had gone. But days and weeks went by and the frog did not return.

Then one day, with a happy splash that shook the weeds, the frog jumped into the pond.

“Where have you been?” asked the fish excitedly.

“I have been about the world—hopping here and there,” said the frog, “and I have seen extraordinary things.”

“Like what?” asked the fish.

“Birds,” said the frog mysteriously. “Birds!” And he told the fish about the birds, who had wings, and two legs, and many, many colors.

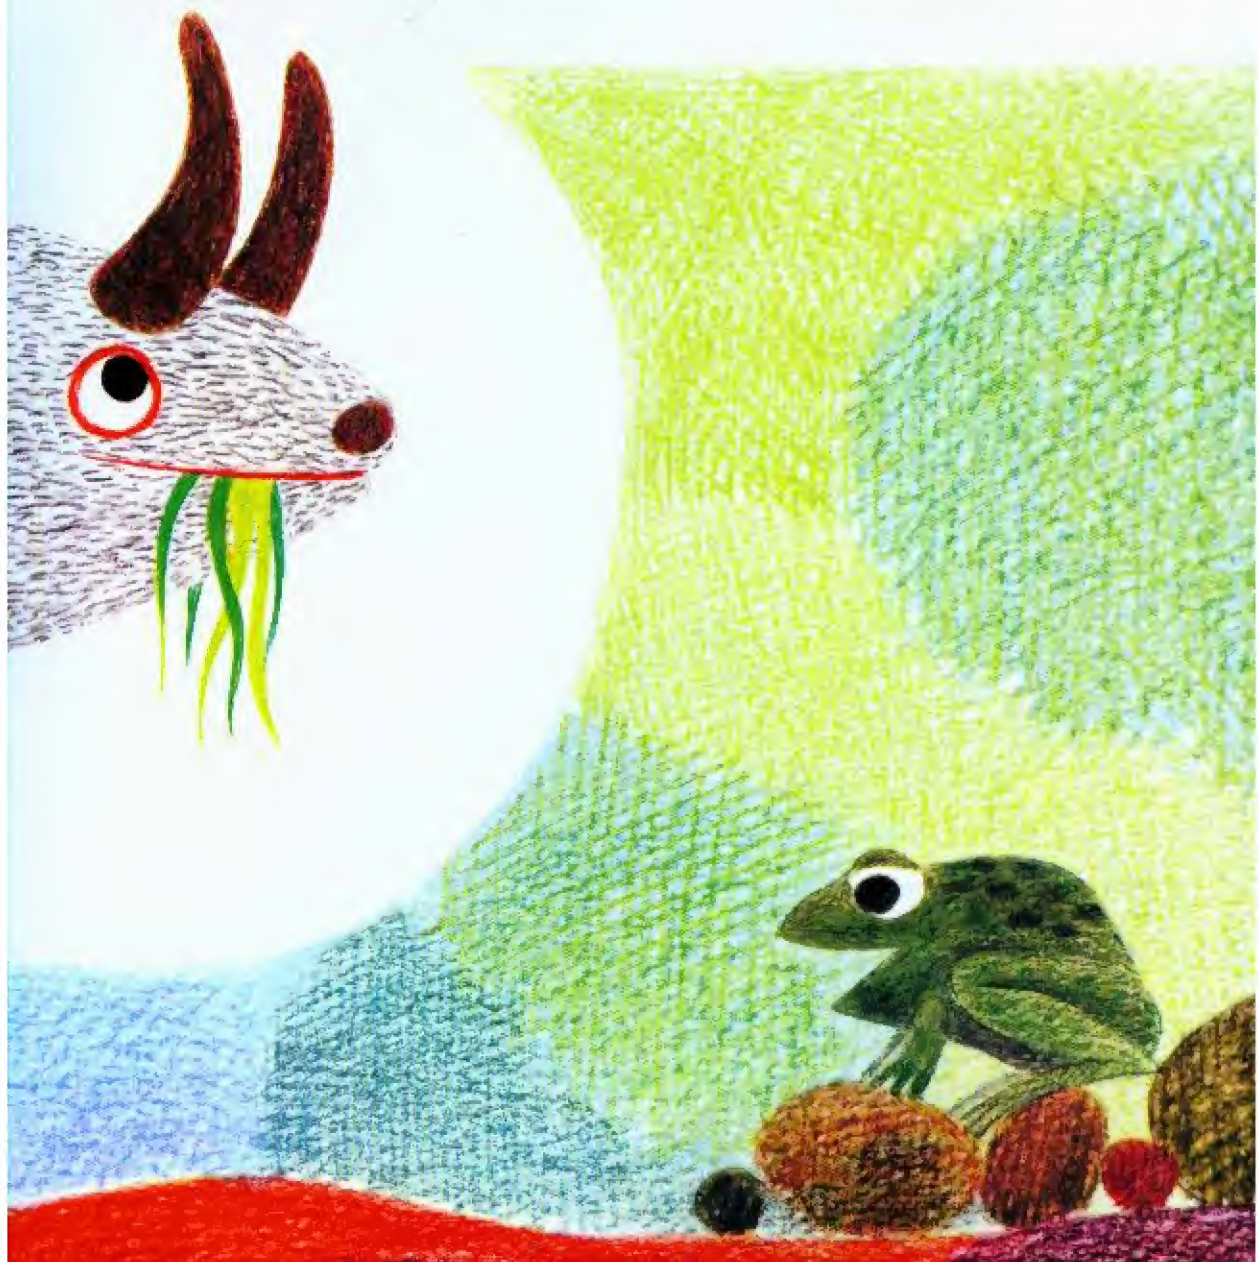

As the frog talked, his friend saw the birds fly through his mind like large feathered fish.

“What else?” asked the fish impatiently.

"Cows," said the frog. "Cows! They have four legs, horns, eat grass, and carry pink bags of milk."

“And people!” said the frog. “Men, women, children!” And he talked and talked until it was dark in the pond.

But the picture in the fish’s mind was full of lights and colors and marvelous things and he couldn’t sleep. Ah, if he could only jump about like his friend and see that wonderful world.

And so the days went by. The frog had gone and the fish just lay there dreaming about birds in flight, grazing cows, and those strange animals, all dressed up, that his friend called people.

One day he finally decided that come what may, he too must see them. And so with a mighty whack of the tail he jumped clear out of the water onto the bank.

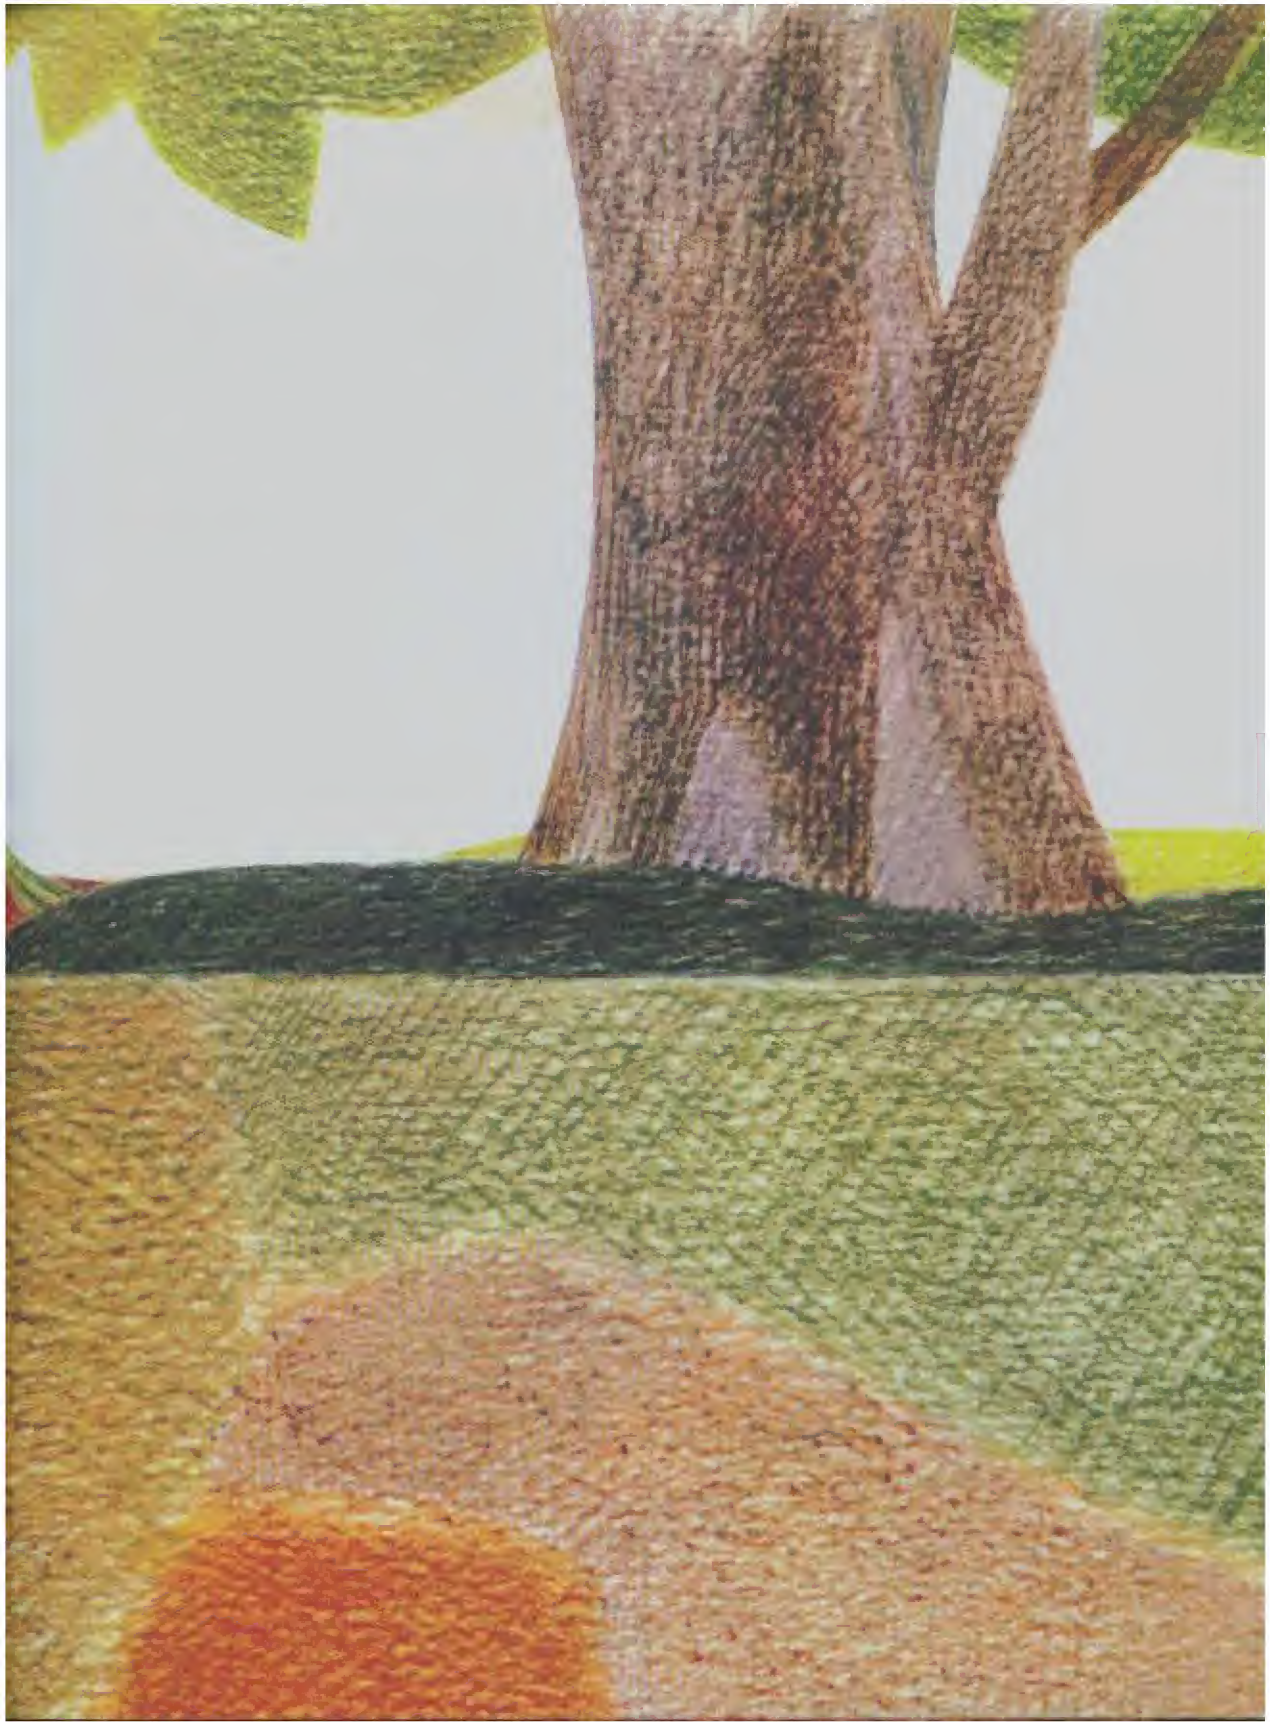

He landed in the dry, warm grass and there he lay gasping for air, unable to breathe or to move. "Help," he groaned feebly.

Luckily the frog, who had been hunting butterflies nearby, saw him and with all his strength pushed him back into the pond.

Still stunned, the fish floated about for an instant. Then he breathed deeply, letting the clean cool water run through his gills. Now he felt weightless again and with an ever-so-slight motion of the tail he could move to and fro, up and down, as before.

The sunrays reached down within the weeds and gently shifted patches of luminous color. This world was surely the most beautiful of all worlds. He smiled at his friend the frog, who sat watching him from a lily leaf. "You were right," he said. "Fish is fish."
